

Dr. Julie Sriken

Assistant Professor, Psychology

Julie Sriken speaks on panels, webinars, and podcasts about violent victimization in order to:

- Explore new solutions to violence
- Encourage audiences to reexamine their experiences
- Support audiences in finding resources

SPEAKING TOPICS

1. Victimization: Why some people who experience intimate partner violence do not describe it as violence, and what that means for screening, outreach, and services.
2. Media & the public: How news coverage, social media, and high-profile criminal trials shape public ideas about victims, perpetrators, and the “ideal victim.”
3. Social norms: How misreading what a community believes drives the behavior people think is normal, and how norms correction can be used in prevention.

BIO

Julie Sriken, Ph.D. is an Assistant Professor in the Department of Psychology and Neuroscience at Regis University in Denver, CO.

Her research explores how people give meaning to lived experiences of violent victimization and how people collectively make sense of what constitutes violence.

Dr. Sriken’s work focuses on the ways social structure and culture influence the way people understand one particularly important life experience: violence.
